Everyday Chinese is a multimedia package for the learning of Chinese. It is designed to enable learners to master basic conversations and to improve their communicative ability in Chinese within a short period of time.

Everyday Chinese features 900 sentences that are frequently used in daily life, including a core vocabulary of 1,500 words comprising around 700 Chinese characters, a supplementary vocabulary of 450 words, and 100 basic sentences.

Besides the reference handbook, Everyday Chinese offers an audio CD (in MP3 format) that contains the 900 sentences, 450 supplementary vocabulary, and 100 basic sentence structures covered in the handbook.

We have received a lot of support from relevant government departments during the writing and publishing process. State Councilor Chen Zhili has graced the package by inscribing the book title. The Office of Chinese Language Council International (Hanban) has offered immense support and pedagogical advice. Many specialists from home and abroad, as well as foreign professionals and students in China have provided valuable suggestions. We owe the successful completion of Everyday Chinese to all of them.

Note on Translation

Translation from any language to another always presents certain difficulties. In providing English translations of the sentences in Everyday Chinese, we chose not to follow literal translation, but instead to provide the phrase or sentence we felt to be closest in terms of function and semantic meaning. For example, sentence 105 : Ràng nǐ jiǔ děng le translates literally into the English sentence “(I) let you wait a long time.” A better functional translation, however, might be “Sorry for having kept you waiting,” since an apologetic tone is implied.
